Paradox Sports Returns to the Shawangunks for Adaptive Climbing Event

Boulder, CO – Paradox Sports will host its second annual Paradox Rocks event in the Shawangunk Mountains of New York. Registration for the event, which takes place Oct. 18-20, is now open. The cost is $75 per climber and includes lodging, meals, gear, instruction and guides.

Paradox Rocks is a weekend of cutting edge adaptive climbing techniques and equipment demonstrated by professional athletes. This event is open to physically disabled people of all ages, as well as their friends, families and caretakers. In addition to professional guides, there will be eight senior cadets from West Point volunteering on sight.

Executive director and professional climber Timmy O'Neill will be in attendance. He will be joined by his brother and T-12 paraplegic Sean O'Neill and Pete Davis, a professional adaptive climber who was born missing his right arm below the elbow. Participants include several veterans, as well as Jon Sedor, who took first place in the upper extremity division of the 2013 Paraclimbing World Cup in London earlier this month.

This event is made possible through grants provided by Mountain Hardwear. For more information, please visit <http://paradoxsports.org> or email pete@paradoxsports.org.
